Justice Precinct was the first “anchor project” commissioned by the government after the Christchurch earthquakes. It was also the first and largest building of its kind in New Zealand with emergency services and court services being in the one building, with an estimate of 2000 people working within it daily.

SWP Commercial had the privilege of installing the membrane warm roofs on this project and with multiple buildings and areas being constructed over 2 years.

SWP had upwards of 30 specialist roofers working on the project, at the time it was our largest roofing project carried out in the South Island.
